

Will Barnet

Will Barnet is a sensitive and highly imaginative artist, qualities which are apparent in every impression that he records in his chosen medium of the lithographic stone. He is also well trained in both the principles and the techniques of picture making, and much of his time is spent in imparting a knowledge of these things to his students. Of necessity that knowledge is reflected in his own work, and he is one of the comparatively few contemporary American lithographers who fulfills the late Bolton Brown's definition in that he carries his work through every step of Senefelder's process himself, in distinction to the 'lithographic draughtsman' who merely makes his drawing on stone or transfer paper and leaves the rest to a professional.

Barnet's style is strictly personal, as every true artist's should be. If he works in the so-called 'modern' idiom, he has not permitted it to dominate him but has taken from it what he believes can best be adapted to his own needs and uses. Neither completely 'abstract' nor wholly 'representational,' his prints combine the two approaches to just that degree which he considers will be most expressive of their meaning. Nor does he labor them, either emotionally or technically, but handles his subject, as he does his crayon, with a certain lightness and gaiety, and sometimes even with a humorous twist, that is very appealing.

Acknowledgement

Few artists living today are entitled to the appellation "American Master." Through a long and distinguished career, Will Barnet has earned that title. For six decades he has created exemplary prints and paintings that elevate and transform the everyday reality of human experience to affirm the heroic dignity and beauty of life. We are delighted to offer our audience an opportunity to see the work of this great artist and to play a part in affording him the recognition he so justly deserves. The catalogue raisonné accompanying the exhibition, supported in part by a prestigious grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, pays tribute to Barnet's artistic and technical mastery as a printmaker.

Our generous patrons have provided overwhelming support for this exhibition, and their commitment to our museum is gratefully acknowledged.

Prints and Printmaking held for me an early fascination. My first great inspiration at age 14 was Daumier: the example he set his profound vision of life and his unequalled draftsmanship. As a painter, I concerned myself with ideas and aesthetics, not permitting technique to overcome the concept. In Printmaking I found a wider, freer means of expression.

My paintings and prints of the early years reflect the effect of social conditions on people. During the late 30s and 40s I explored the image of mother and child and the growth of a family – themes to which I have returned throughout my career. The 50s were devoted almost entirely to the formal abstract aspects of painting and printmaking and preoccupation with the two dimensional reality of the surface and the play of form and color, the major objects being human shapes and forms.

In the early 60s the figure became explicit and the abstract concepts were integrated into new and vital forms. I was concerned with the mood and the purity of the figure and its plastic structure. In the 70s, my WOMEN OF THE SEA series reflected the eternal woman and her relationship to nature. It began one evening as I saw my wife standing alone on a porch in our summer home in Maine. It was dusk and her figure was silhouetted against the sea. It was a moment to remember. I made a sketch of the scene and began a series of paintings of women and the sea that have continued to this day.

Family and environment have always exerted a strong influence on me. When my daughter had a son, new motifs appeared almost immediately in my work. When change occurs, the resulting personal vision is logically formed from past experience.

I feel there is a consistency between all these decades despite different themes, settings and plastic expressions. My work evolves in relationship to my growth as each day of life offers new experiences: when art can transform nature and everyday events.

Will Barnett

Will Barnet: An American Master

Will Barnet, an innovator in print-making and one of the most important living artists of the 20th century, has produced over 240 print editions in his career. As a professional artist, teacher, and arts administrator since 1930, he is regarded as the most influential printmaker of the second half of the 20th century. As an artist whose versatility reflects important changes in style over the past seventy years, Barnet's work documents major Modern art movements in 20th century America.

Barnet began his distinguished career at the Art Students League in 1930. The following year he studied with master lithographer Charles Locke. Subway (1931), his earliest surviving print, depicts a mysterious space, seemingly without entrances or exits, and a lonely, anonymous worker. The planar ceiling structure, supporting piers, and upended floor create a composition that borders on abstraction.

Like much of the art created at the League in the 1930s, Barnet's work was based on observations of everyday life. His images of unguarded and undignified moments were influenced by Honoré Daumier's whimsical 19th century French lithographs. Central Park Siesta (1932) and Makeshift Kitchen (1935), two early lithographs from the first three years of Barnet's tenure at the Art Students League, were drawn from the artist's life in New York City during the Depression. The Pool Room (1934) was printed from sketches made on Thompson Street in the Village at the Grand Ticino, a favorite eating place of Barnet's colleagues. The Miner's Son (1935) is a portrait of Joe, one of the ten children of an unemployed miner who came to New York in search of work and was Barnet's neighbor on Manhattan's Lower East Side. Such images, painted and printed by American Realists at the League, gained popularity with the public through the efforts of Barnet, his mentor Charles Locke, and ASL president John Sloan.

In accord with his interest in observing everyday life, Barnet's prints also function as a revealing family album, recording not only the development of his perceptions and style, but also the lives of his children and grandchildren. Mother and Child (1938) exemplifies Barnet's growing interest in representing his nuclear family members, who would later become his favorite subjects.

Influenced by Central European artists who immigrated to the United States during World War II, Barnet merged American Scene subjects with the harsh calligraphic lines of German Expressionism. A woodcut depicting his wife awakening in their small apartment, Early Morning (1939) marks a radical departure for Barnet. As his early ideas of light and dark or shadow changed, he contrasted pure white areas with strong black lines in a search for greater personal artistic expression.

Barnet was briefly employed by the Graphic Art Division of the Works Progress Administration Federal Art Project, where he printed several of his own works as well as works by other artists. The most important aspect of this employment for Barnet was his friendship with other WPA/FAP artists, including Mexican muralists Diego Rivera and José Orozco, who introduced Barnet to the formal beauty of Native art. Increasingly drawn to abstraction, Barnet's serigraph Go-Go (1947) was inspired by the pure and simple compositions and brightly colored building block components of Mexican imagery in the 1930s and 1940s. Soon after, he began to exhibit with a group of New Yorkers, including Steve Wheeler, Robert Barrell, and Peter Busa (known as the Indian Space Painters), who incorporated the European Modernism of Wassily Kandinsky and Arshile Gorky with Native American imagery. Strange Birds (1947), a black and white lithograph reflecting Barnet's love of Northwest Coast tribal art, captures this new interest in abstraction and schematized and stylized animal motifs. Morning, one of several color lithographs that Barnet made between 1947 and 1952, explores these notions in terms of the human figure in a dreamlike garden setting. In this series, the artist incorporates stylistic influences from Impressionism, children's art, and the schematic abstraction of Native American art.

Makeshift Kitchen, 1935

As an active member of American Abstract Artists, Barnett reconsidered the illusions of three dimensional space and naturalism. According to the artist, his search to find forms that belonged to the pure matter of painting itself by eliminating realistic space led him to a basic, simplified presentation of subject matter. Play (1952) retains a figurative reference, but the immediate impression is one of bright colors and swirling lines. Fine Friends (1952), a portrait of Barnett's son and his cat, is a radical simplification in response to the innocent and uncomplicated affection of the boy for his pet.

Also finding inspiration in geometric abstraction, Barnett derived his presentation of subject matter from a foundation of signs and symbolic forms. Wine, Women and Song (1958), a linoleum cut, exemplifies the artist's struggle to depict the essence of his private thoughts in terms of color and form. Heavy, solid lines surround and contain the symbols for his figures. With a personal vocabulary of controlled and studied flat color surfaces and interlocking vertical and horizontal masses, he represents the human body as a physical structure.

From the late 1940s through 1960, Barnett was fully engrossed by abstract art. Having rejected the idea of arbitrary placement of color and line, however, he never embraced Abstract Expressionism of the 1950s and 1960s, although his students at Cooper Union, including Mark Rothko and Cy Twombly, became leaders of that movement through the 1960s.

Even though Barnett was drawn toward abstraction, attempts to bridge the gap between realism and abstraction became increasingly difficult for him. He had formed too many abstract symbols in place of the figure, and he could no longer evaluate it as a realistic object in his current style. Because the figure had always been the primary source of his imagery, the possibility of dismissing the human form completely was deeply disturbing to the artist. In the mid-1960s, Barnett solved this dilemma by returning to the human figure as a vehicle of expression in a new presentation that shared a direct relationship to Hard Edge painting, a controlled variation of Abstract Expressionism, and to American Scene painting. He successfully integrated the formal characteristics of abstraction with a new representation of the human form.

The 1960s marked a new stylistic plateau for Barnett. He meticulously refined his contemplative and graceful figure studies, silhouetting them against monochromatic backgrounds. Atalanta, a print of daughter Ona contemplating an apple, pictures her as the heroine of a Greek myth whose fate was decided by her desire for a golden apple. Exemplifying Barnett's new visual vocabulary, Atalanta, and other similar prints of the 1970s, link contemporary life, classical myth, and Barnett's interest in classical Greece as the origin of all canons. The female form, according to Barnett, represents humanity, and the birds recall an archetypal wilderness of flight, freedom, and the supernatural. No longer content to merely document the human form, Barnett transformed his abstract symbols of humanity into female personifications of classical mythology.

Barnett's work of the 1980s and 1990s demonstrates a mature synthesis of his earlier thematic, formal, and aesthetic concerns, as in Meditation and Minou (1980). The prints convey truthful accounts of human existence within a matrix of abstract ideas presented through personifications, metaphors, and symbols increasingly familiar to both artist and viewer. In works such as Ariadne, Circe II, and Persephone, his wife and daughter are seen as mythic figures representing abstract concepts, such as contemplation, the seasons, and play. The strong grey backs of the three women who face the sea in his color lithograph Peter Grimes (1983) suggest the solidarity of the village against Grimes in the opera by Benjamin Britten. Summer (1986), a stylized rendition of severe profile and frontal views, is softened by a jacket of blue and a dress of white, colors traditionally associated with peace and purity.

Barnett's work has ranged from American Scene lithographs of life in New York City in the 1930s, to abstract aquatints, color woodcuts and etchings of the 1950s and 1960s, to representational figures in contemporary silkscreens of the 1970s through 1990s. His oeuvre provides a microcosm of modern movements in the history of American art and of the development of printmaking as a fine art form from 1930 through 1990. As a celebrated American artist with a long and distinguished career, he has truly earned the title of American master.

Will Barnet: Printmaking

The creative genius and technical mastery of Will Barnet make him one of the greatest practitioners of twentieth-century printmaking. Throughout his sixty-six year career, Barnet has worked on all four significant variations of modern printmaking: relief, (woodcut and linocut); intaglio (etching and aquatint); planography (lithography); and stencil (serigraph). Through the exploration of these techniques, Barnet's versatile printmaking abilities are revealed.

Woodcut is the most widely known and used technique associated with the relief method of printmaking. To create a woodcut, the artist carves a design on a hard, polished block of wood, forming a relief and furrow. The raised surface yields the positive image that is printed. As with other relief prints, the ink is applied with a roller onto the raised surface, the paper is placed on the block, and the image is transferred by rubbing the back of the paper or by running the block and paper through the press.

In Early Morning (1939), Barnet carved along the grain of the block, using a variety of woodcutter's tools, creating a design that was technically and aesthetically successful. Early Morning won first prize at the Philadelphia Print Club's 16th Annual American Block Print and Wood Engraving Exhibition in 1942 and the Brooklyn Museum's Purchase Award at the First National Print Exhibition in 1947. This angular-lined image also appeared on the cover of The League in April of 1944.

Another technique employed by Barnet is etching, a method of intaglio engraving. To create an etching, an acid-resistant ground is laid on top of a metal plate. The artist scratches a design through the ground with an etching needle, exposing portions of the underlying plate. The plate is bitten, or "etched," by placing it in an acid bath, or by covering it with the mordant, to incise the lines. A print is made by inking the incised lines and the recessed textures of a plate, wiping the surface, placing damp paper over the plate, and running it through the etching press. Barnet's Young Couple (1971) is a classic example of the art of etching.

An additional technique associated with intaglio printmaking and the etching process is aquatint. In this process, the plate is partially covered with a pine resin or enamel ground through which the surface is etched. In contrast to the finely engraved lines of traditional etchings, the lines of an aquatint are formed by small groupings of textural rings. This creates a finished product that closely resembles a wash drawing. In Barnet's aquatints Tailor Sewing (1936) and Positano (1962), he achieves an image with enhanced tonality.

Lithography is the most autographic printmaking technique. The process of lithography is based on the chemical principle that grease and water are naturally opposed. In traditional lithography, an image is drawn onto a stone or metal plate with a greasy medium. The image is etched and fixed with a mixture of dilute gum arabic and nitric acid. The stone is dampened with a thin water film and printing ink is applied, adhering only to the greased areas. Paper is placed over the surface of the inked stone and pressed against it to produce a lithograph.

While studying with Charles Locke at the Art Students League, Barnet used academic lithographic practices developed in Germany and France in the nineteenth-century. By studying the classical works of Nicolas Poussin and copying the genre lithographs of Honoré Daumier, Barnet honed his lithographic skill. Intent upon drawing from life, Barnet carried 150-pound lithographic stones on his shoulder from his studio and up four flights of steps to his apartment. Although lithographers usually stand over their stones and draw on a horizontal surface, Barnet propped his stone on a chair to work vertically, like a painter using an easel. In Barnet's color lithograph, Play (1952), the artist captures the immediacy of a freshly drawn pencil or brush stroke with characteristic qualities intact.

An ancient method of oriental printmaking, screenprinting has become one of the most popular 20th century methods. Commercially, screenprinting is known as "screen process printing" or "silkscreen." In the 1940s, a group of American artists renamed it "serigraphy" to denote its fine art application. The technique of screenprinting involves the application of stencils to a frame-stretched gauze textile, traditionally of silk, but, more recently, of synthetic or metallic material. When the thickened ink is applied, the stencil selectively blocks portions of the mesh, preventing ink from passing through the entire screen. As the ink moves through the unblocked areas of the surface, the image is printed on the paper.

Although Barnet's first serigraph was created in 1940, he did not turn to screenprinting as his primary choice for printing until the 1960s. In Three Chairs (1998), a recent work, Barnet's use of color and the serigraph technique enhance this striking family portrait.

For Barnet, the process of printmaking is as important as the product. An ingenious technician, Barnet employs his skills to produce composite images. Play (1975) demonstrates the artist's ability to create a print that is both a lithograph and a serigraph.

Barnet's oeuvre documents more than a half century of printmaking expertise, and the fifty-six prints compiled for Will Barnet: An American Master establish the artist's uncompromising technical standards. The sophisticated visual vocabulary of Barnet's prints, together with his technical mastery as a printmaker, identify Will Barnet as one of this century's most significant artists.

My paintings and prints of the early years reflect the effect of social conditions on people.

After completing studies with Philip Hale at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts School in 1930 and at the Art Students League of New York, Barnet turned to printmaking as his medium of choice. At the age of 23, he was hired as a master printer and instructor at the Art Students League. He also worked as a free lance printmaker for Works Progress Administration artists, while continuing to produce his own work. His preference for lithography and his mastery of this medium are exemplified by Concert, Metropolitan Museum (1934). Barnet produced his first etching (Scene in Central Park) in 1934, followed by other exceptional prints, such as Tailor Sewing (1936). He experimented with monotype in 1935 and 1936 (Mary, 1936), and even produced an instructional film to introduce the technique to his students and other printmakers. Later, Barnet worked with relief prints, and, from 1936 to 1940, more than half of his prints were woodcuts (Early Morning, 1939) or linocuts. Barnet's work received recognition at the 1934 exhibition Fifty American Prints (Architectural League, New York) and with his first solo exhibition at the Hudson Walker Gallery in New York in 1938.

During the late 30s and 40s, I explored the image of mother and child and the growth of a family – themes which I have returned to throughout my career.

Confident that teaching would provide a secure professional environment, Barnett accepted a position at Cooper Union in New York in 1945, where he remained for 33 years. He also taught at the Art Students League until 1981, while continuing to print small editions for himself and WPA-sponsored artists. As an established printmaker, he exhibited in New York, Pennsylvania, and Washington, D.C., and his first museum exhibition was mounted at Richmond's Virginia Museum of Fine Art in 1943. His early interest in the medium of silkscreen (Peter and the Birdie, 1940 and Go-Go, 1947) would shape the future of his printmaking career. Strange Bird, a 1947 lithograph published in a portfolio by Laurel Galleries in New York with prints by Joan Miro, Stanley William Hayter, Anne Ryan, Walter Pach, Reginald Marsh, and George Constant, was inspired by Native American art. Barnett's interest in spatial representation and flat stylized geometric forms (also seen in Go-Go), led to the establishment of a group later known as the Indian Space Painters.

The 50s were devoted almost entirely to the formal abstract aspects of painting and printmaking and preoccupation with the two dimensional reality of the surface and the play of form and color, the major objects being human shapes and forms.

Barnet created few large print editions during the 1950s and 1960s, focusing instead on his paintings. In 1950, his work was included in American Painting Today at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, attracting the attention of leading art critics. His prints, however, were featured in the Cincinnati Art Museum's First International Biennial of Contemporary Color Lithography that same year. Barnet and master printer Robert Blackburn conducted pioneering experiments in color lithography, using as many as seventeen lithographic stones to capture the vivid hues in one final print. Barnet was also experimenting with abstraction. Inspired by children's art, he reduced the figure in Play (1952) to its simplest components, retaining directness of expression even with a process as complex as color lithography. Wine, Women and Song (1958), a figurative essay visualized in flat shapes devoid of modeling and perspective, exemplifies his interest in juxtaposing abstracted forms of shapes and colors to study the nature of primary relationships. Barnet taught this new style and lithographic process to his students at Yale University and Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute. His work was exhibited by the American Federation of Arts (New York), and his first museum retrospective exhibition was mounted at the Tweed Museum of Art in Duluth.

In the early 1960s the figure became explicit, and the abstract concepts were integrated into new and vital forms. I was concerned with the mood and the purity of the figure and its plastic structure.

By 1960 Barnet had abandoned representational narrative for figurative abstraction, as illustrated by Positano (1962), an aquatint printed in subtle hues of black and gray, and Enveloping Forms, a color woodcut of deep red, green, black, and blue. Barnet's abstractions were exhibited at the International Biennial Exhibition of Prints in Tokyo (1960) and at the Whitney Museum of American Art's Geometric Abstraction in America (1962). By 1964, however, Barnet had returned to representational, figurative art. Blue Robe (cover image) was first printed as a black and white aquatint, reprinted for Brandeis University National Women's Committee in 1969, and printed in a color edition in 1971. Although Barnet retained the flowing and mannered poses of subjects and settings, Woman and Cats (1969) and Blue Robe illustrate the artist's return to figurative work, marking a critical event in his career.

Woman and Cats, 1969

1970s

Blue Robe (cover), Atalanta and Play exemplify Barnet's commitment to a style and to subject matter developed in his early printmaking career. Redefined in the 1970s, his compactness of design and graduated tones of color brilliantly illuminating sky and setting offset the solid color fields of contemplative figures. Inspired by mythology and his family, Barnet developed a uniquely personal style of presentation in this decade, while retaining his interest in spatial relationships of form, color, and shape. His subjects personify loneliness and introspection, often solitary women interacting with objects. Atalanta, commissioned by Kennedy Graphics in New York for the 1976 Olympics, depicts his daughter Ona contemplating an apple as the athletic heroine of a Greek myth, whose fate was decided when her desire for a golden apple caused her to lose a race. Ona also appears as the model for Play. During this decade, print retrospectives were held for Barnet at the Associated Artists of New York, Jorgensen Auditorium, and the Print Club of Philadelphia. His work was also included in The Influence of Spiritual Inspiration on American Art at the Vatican.

My Woman and the Sea series reflects the eternal woman and her relationship to nature.

In the decade of the 1980s, museum retrospectives continued to celebrate Barnet's work as he reached his 50th year of printmaking. The artist derived inspiration from literature and music, personal experiences, and by using family members as his models. Barnet portrayed daughter Ona as Madame Butterfly (title page) and as one of the townswomen in Peter Grimes (1983). His wife, wrapped in a shawl and looking out to sea, became the artist's metaphor for New England's seafaring history and the loneliness and isolation of women waiting for their husbands' return. Woman and the Sea (1973) led to a series of prints and paintings that he would rework for the next twelve years. In this initial work Barnet contrasts the soft pale colors of sky and sea with foreground images of solitary, linear figures and with the horizon line. Peter Grimes (1983) and Spring Morning (1985) developed from the same stylistic and compositional foundation.

Spring Morning, 1985

There is a consistency between all the decades of my work, despite different themes, settings, and plastic expressions.

Barnet's prints of the 1990s derive composition and subject matter from his meticulously designed oil paintings. Three Chairs (1998) is based upon a watercolor of the same title painted in 1992. Skater (1991), with flattening of unshaded forms and unmodulated color, is typical of the stark and timeless effect of the artist's later prints. A series he created to illustrate The World in a Frame: The Emily Dickinson Suite traveled to five New England museums. Barnet's recent prints have also been exhibited in St. Louis and in a solo exhibition at the Butler Institute of American Art, Youngstown. In 1995 the Worcester Museum of Art acquired a complete print retrospective of Barnet's oeuvre, the only singular collection to explore the artist's career. As he reaches his seventh decade of printmaking, Barnet continues to create new prints, drawing inspiration from earlier works, personal experiences, and his family.
