

WILKES COLLEGE ARCHIVES
Eugene Shedden Farley Library

MANUSCRIPT

THE MANUSCRIPT

a collection of poetry prose and art composed at several times throughout the academic year of 1972~1973

by Students of Wilkes College

Duke. The best in this kinde are but shadows and the worst are no worse, if imagination amend them.

*A Midsummer nights dreame.
Act V Scene i*

vol. XXVI, nos. I & II
MCMLXXIII
CRO WOODS PRINTERY
WYOMING, PENNSYLVANIA

DIONYSIAN REVELLER

Of you I sing
my ruby-eyed portugese, capped by a golden-hued bonnet, winking coyly behind a soft green window

A stronger temptation you are, than sun filled May when dry labor calls,
a flowing warmth, unmatched by crackling logs in hearthful lure, unhoused, you joyfully swirl, enticing in cut crystal, prideless in decanted mirth;
no friend of melancholy you whose laughing soul spirits away
the pensive mood,
the knitted brow,
yet more than friend to me, my blushing lover,
a cold first touch belies the fire you are, the joy you give,
and by your favor
a dancing spirit released, whirling on liquid sunbeams.

Bob Fiori

Twitch

have we crept through this sticky vision for nothing?

had chaos once over for breakfast contemplating great shiny black-balled tits.
(sunrise over Pennsylvania coal mine shit) have we met the wet parted lips of dream with our own stretched wide yawning.

have we tugged at the grace of childhood crawled towards the womb of our fathers great gowns only to find his fingers lame and tattered searching probing at wisdoms rusty panties. and thus agreed the whole world was our straight man and we the great jokers in charge of editing and the old age warp.

have we unraveled these historic nights for nothing? for nothing have we hypnotized our fate and rolled the whores of our sensorium? for nothing?, for nothing at all?; the night unbuttons its collar red lights switch to green for our approach trucks graciously pass us on lakes tease their bleached hair shyly expecting where our old car leads to now.

Bloody gash in the consciousness Dripping cartilage of catatonia sweat on every pore of body brain gums nerve chilled inside marrow back of neck jaw locked open no air
lungs limp

S W A L L O W deathpass out drywindy oblivion

Your bony fingers pressed on your skull Louis Armstrong in the Potomac night and Lordee them Saints came marchin' through the orange dome of dope and prison Virginia

Michael Scholnick

JACK IN METAMORPHOSIS

Never a woman can touch you now.
Rigid scratched sick-city grafitti's carved into a moon what once was sun to brick-blank walls your got-god hands defined.

Your rain-soaked lines designed to still shook chills abort a quiet tear just catch cold questions, yes!
For at the prick of one prodigal pant hair in your crotch you wince in nausea is a woman's finger body breast.

Well, was it first the chicken?
yes
the egg,
though cracked,
still quakes its throttled birth as quiver-killed you come to him, on trembling tightrope toes to him, one pristine kiss — the metamorphosis!

Cindy Locke

Sleeping next to me, you appeared as serene and still as a quiet pool of clear water.

I gazed at you fearing to touch you and disturb your sleep as a pebble would disturb the water's calmness.

So I waited by the banks of your body till the morning sun came over the hill and as the fog of sleep lifted from your eyes I touched your face and drifted into the rolling, soft waves of your love —

Agnes Cummings

The Hunting

Babies of the dust paws wrapped snugly-tucked around twelve hugging pumpkins Hollow rotted hulls grapple for shady seas until young stars join hands and play for days and sell fragments of themselves to babies in the dust

Nanci Adler

Recompense

Giovanna had been married to Vincenza for thirty-two years, and for thirty-two years they had lived in the same house just outside a backwards rural village. She was the mother of ten children; the three oldest, Primo, Secunda, and Trece had married and left home. Giovanna was by no means sorry to see them go, for it was hard to make ends meet on the small amount of money Vincenza brought home, and one could hardly say that the children had been conceived in love. Giovanna was married at fourteen. Her parents were happy to have matched her so young, and Vincenza was satisfied with his bride because he had waited till he was past his youth to seek a wife. They met for the first time at the altar, and it was said that the vows they spoke to each other were their last civil words of conversation. Throughout their marriage Vincenza worked in the fields of the vineyards, and Giovanna cooked his meals and kept his house with an attitude of perseverance. She knew how and when to argue with him, and when to be silent. She knew also that when he stayed very late at the tavern that he would come home and beat her until she no longer had the strength to cry out. Giovanna's only consolation was her overwhelming faith that she would have recompense in the afterlife, and she did everything in her power to insure her desperate hopes. She rose each morning at sunrise and walked to the village to attend mass. During lent she made a second trip in the afternoon to say the stations of the cross. She filled her house with plaster statues of saints and ornate but faded pictures of holy martyrs, and she filled her mind with the prayers and petitions she'd known since childhood. Each was so familiar to her and yet each time she went over one in her mind she tried to fill it with a new urgency. The largest statue was in her bedroom near the bed. When she could manage to skimp enough in her grocery shopping, she would spend the few lire on a votive candle which she'd light at dusk each night. Each night she'd kneel in the candlelit room before the large statue of the Madonna and pray with her beads in her hand, with her face contorted into an expression of agony, and occasionally her shoulders would shake with silent sobbing.

Just as the years served to intensify Giovanna's devotion, they seemed to embitter Vincenza's disposition. When his third son was old enough to go into the fields to work, he ceased to go. Instead he spent all his time and much of the household money at the tavern. The more devout Giovanna became, the more contemptuous he was of it. One night as darkness fell and Giovanna fell to her knees in prayer, he charged out of the house and down to the tavern to have peace, he said, and to escape the unbearable spectacle of holiness. He spent the rest of the night in the tavern, where he drank himself senseless. In the small hours of the morning the disgusted tavern-keeper tossed him out into the street. He stood there, as if rooted, and his body swayed from side to side.

The sun rose over the corpse that lay in the middle of the main street in the village. Giovanna rose as usual with the sun to get dressed for mass. As she was descending the road into the village, she met the wagon carrying Vincenza's body back to the house, and she was so overcome with grief that she fell to the ground next to the wagon. The two men from the village climbed down from the wagon and picked up her sobbing form. They laid her in the wagon next to the corpse, and she, as though unaware of their presence, remained limp and sobbing on the bed of the wagon.

Giovanna was in a state of hysteria throughout the hours that followed. She was incapable even of dressing herself and when her daughter Secunda arrived at her mother's home, she had to dress her in the black attire she would wear from that day till the end of her life. The wake lasted only one day, and when they finally closed the casket, Giovanna threw herself over it and wept and moaned. She began to talk incoherently as the pallbearers carried her away from the casket. They lifted the box to remove it, and Giovanna sobbed, "Oh, my God, no . . . my God, why don't you take me instead?"

Ann Schifano

Hard Times For a Sweetheart

Let them march unto the gates and watch them gather at the tables dropping half-dead roses at your feet

It is deaths green cheeks that rattle at the door

Let them be!
Let them be dear friend!
It is not us who place before them galaxies in which to dance and dream of jewels aflame

Let them be!

Let them hear their requests and watch them clap to your rhythm and blues twisting your elegant chants into petty elaborations

Let them be!
only we shall be alone in this grey and cold transnight eyelids ashes faces pale as pale as moon in eternal poem

Let them be my lil' lamb Let them be!

I have seen you climb the steps to bedrooms lonely breast.

I dreamt our river reached a damn where we placed our skulls atop the rest

Michael Scholnick

Once Again for Zelda (A Geometry)

Our lives are half a ghost.
I am a thing inanimate you are phantom in search of flesh and form.

Ha! I thought it was I who glistened these chiselings who christened their articulation with melody who soaked their sockets with contemplation.

who gave these oily puddles sun? you did.
and when you leave we stumble in the dark and collide—hysterical like electrons starved for a compound.

Disguised as rainbows we leave in a vapor to rain on the roots of this unreal town.

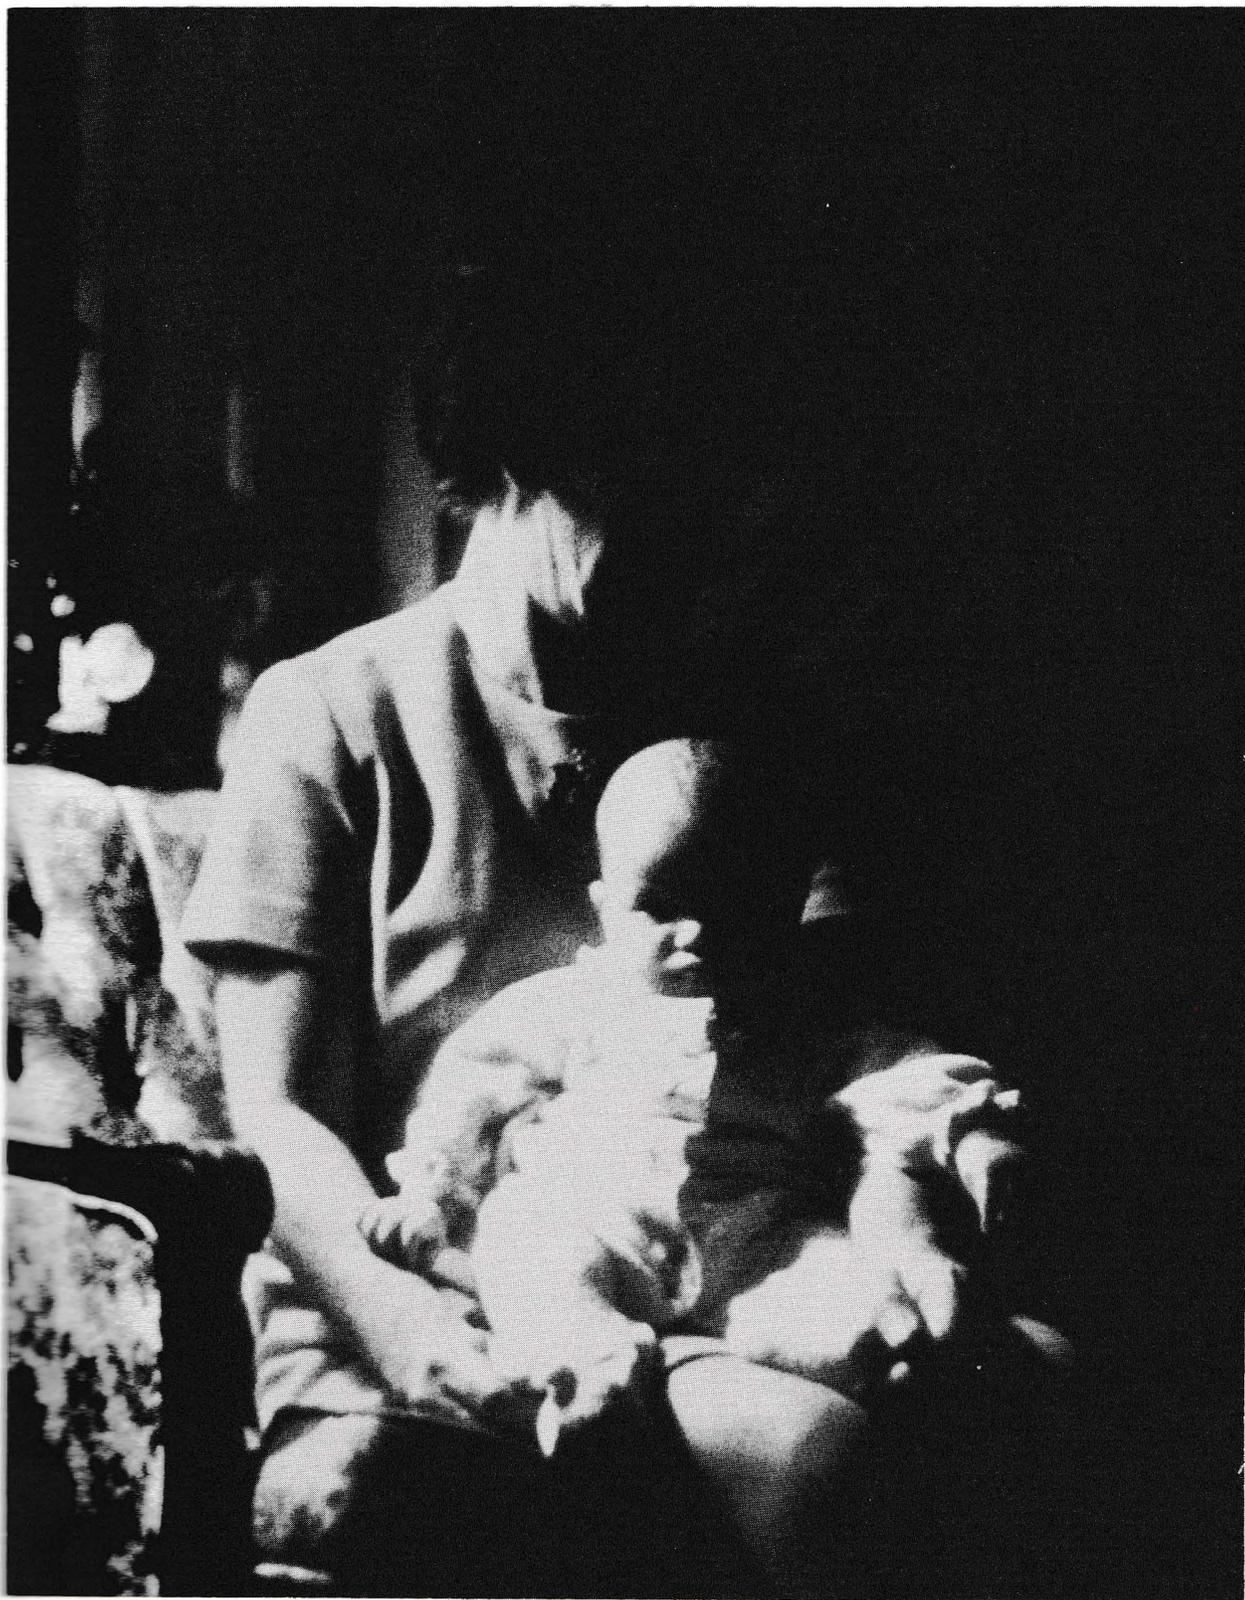

Michael Scholnick

Untitled
Ella McNamara

Untitled
Cathy Kosiek

Untitled

Eva Antanelis

"The Blossom"
Katy Hauck

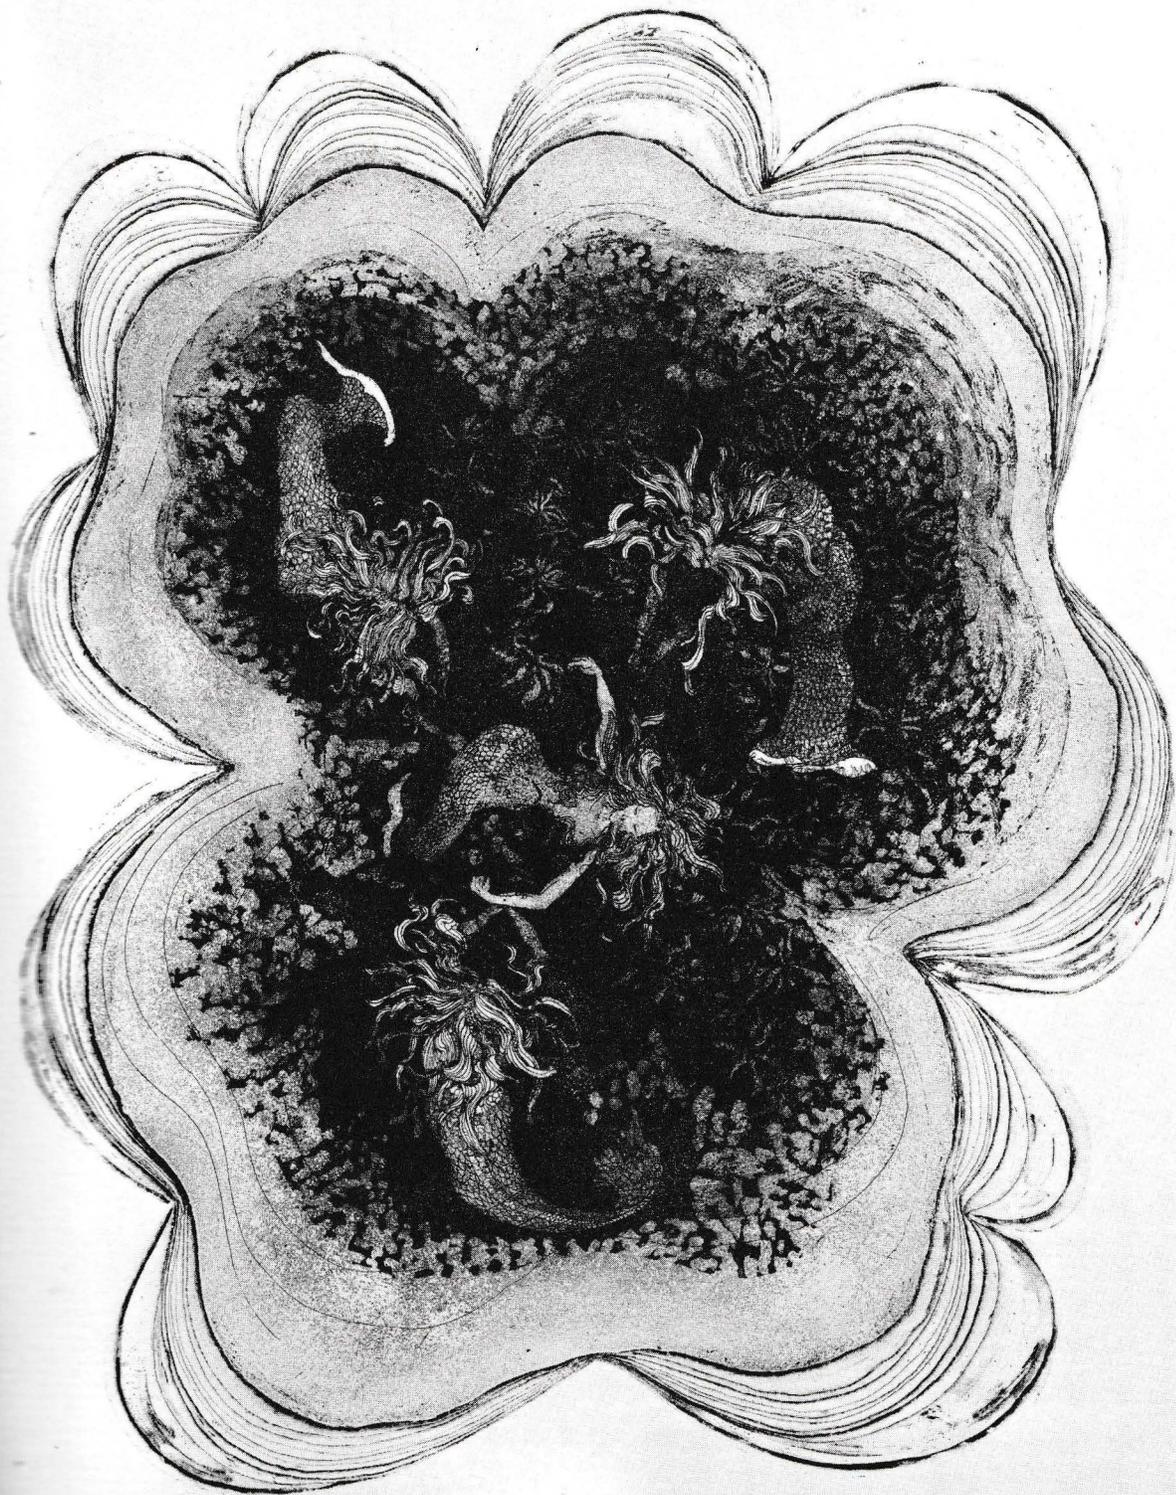

"Love gangsters"

Bob Mikoloyczak

Gramma Brown

Randy Steele

"Death of a Sea Nymph"
Katy Hauck

The Infants

A gang of infant teddy bears kissing, hugging— all in pairs Blushing fruits caress their rinds While bunnies make sniveling finds

The spheroid earth with spinning smile eyes betray lost phantom whites And mold devours a breathing yeast While gangs of infant men try least

Within the garbled land of Here dripping spirits wheeze with cheer As the sun spills darkening foam Our eyes, in corners, whisper “home...”

Nanci Adler

I'll Remember your sentence Just remember my incision have we lost it amigo?

What?
Youth — her fantasy insatiate as death itself

Our lives are a dream flame two sticks rubbing in some parable of hope nails and hammers rusting in the ocean how are we to love in this where our one moment is ruled by some drunken cameramen fucking around wit the lights?
We're two men in this cosmic precision What gifts to send in this toothless universe?
Are we just stars blue swallowed dripping our twinkling prayers along some other dimensions speed of light?

Do we do our own way?
two tangents in search of a circle dry heaving our affection on this century and pavement.
Our memories lacklove and our faculties dissolved each day to sleep.
And where to that sleep? to dream?
Ah But that dream a web sweet wherein lies our Belle Reve caught For there is no dream home lost only we at home in a dream

But oh Tovaritch how slow the evolution Our spirit Elysium gasping on the sands and our prayed for radiation creeping quietly in its iceage How in the labyrinth the ecstasy How slow the exquisite mutation

Cough it up
Cough it up now Imagination dust begins to clot
You need to vision up no birds Dammit
You are one yourself with your inhuman wings glittering in the moist and this ancient earth your endless skyway

Michael Scholnick

A PROMISE OF SURVIVAL

He crouched by his signal fire while twilight pasted his long shadow on the ground behind him. He felt the aching pain from the three days and two nights he had spent on the beach and knew he could not stay a fourth. To observe his behavior, one would think him to be rather peculiar. He seemed content to sit for hours in assiduous concentration on the face of the ocean that lay before him. At times, he would rise, rush to the water's edge, gaze intently, and soon return disappointedly to his former position. He was occasionally lifted to his feet by extreme rage, kicking sand and cursing some unseen offender. Then, just as suddenly, he would be thrown back on the ground by an uncontrollable fit of laughter. His other animated moments were spent covering and recovering a large side of beef with rags soaked in salt water. He went about this task with the skill and patience of a surgeon dressing the wounds of an injured man. Each time he finished, he would pat the meat maternally and gaze seaward. At night, his huddled form fell over and slept as if he were the door of a warm house shut tight against a cold night. He had been on the island for three days and was growing weary of his unrewarded vigil. The afternoon of the third day had found him occasionally looking inland at a forest a few miles off. By the morning of the fourth, he was resolved to leave the beach and make for the distant forest where his survival was more assured. He cursed the island for being so large that he could not remain near the beach, in sight of passing ships. At the same time, he blessed it since its size surely meant that there would be plenty to eat in the forest beyond. Sand crabs and other inhabitants of the beach made up the larger portion of his diet. The side of beef would keep him from starvation on his journey inland and so he saved it and continued nursing it. Often, he would lie beside it, cradling it in his arms, and nibble on it or just press his tongue against the salty flesh. The meat was a promise of survival to him, a defense against the effects of an angry or indifferent God.

Four days ago, he was a deck hand on the "Patina," a small Spanish trading ship. His duties were to help haul the sails up the masts and position them before the best wind. He did this with many other men, all straining at the ropes while the great sail crept up the mast, catching the wind as it climbed. He could not help but feel that he was somehow cheating the wind by making it do what it had not intended. It made him feel good to have this power. Four days ago he had been pulling at the ropes and gazing at the white sail swallowing the wind when something flew down across the stretched canvas. It was Manuel. Somehow, he had lost his footing at his post halfway up the mizzen. He landed in a crumpled heap near the others. There was a moment's hesitation, then some of the crew silently gathered him up and took him somewhere below deck. Their reaction was ant-like. It was hard to know whether they carried him away out of respect or to clear the deck so they could continue their work. They had thought it to be an accident plain and simple. He remembered how the Captain gave him charge of the body. He remembered also how he pleaded with the Captain later that evening. He tried to explain that he knew something of sickness and death and that Manuel had not died of a fall, that he died of the plague. The Captain could do nothing but stare back at him with his pale, bloated face. The Captain and two others died a short time later. He knew nothing of these additional deaths. For him, the evidence that Manuel provided was sufficient to warrant his course of action. As he left the Captain, he made his way to the supply room. After cutting down one of the large sides of beef that hung there, he dragged it up to the deck and loaded it into a lifeboat. He lowered the boat over the side and left his dying shipmates to their common end. He had been on the "Patina" for a few years and travelled this route often so he was familiar with the charts for the area. Though he had never seen it, he knew the island would be there.

Now, on the morning of the fourth day, his signal fire had not been seen by any passing ships. As far as he could tell, there had been no passing ships. And so, he decided to journey inland where he would be more comfortable. If all went well, he would return in a month and build a new fire. His decision seemed to reassure him and allowed him to shake off the weakness that had accumulated during the last few days. At first, he thought the weakness may have been the plague. But he had survived many sicknesses and so it was too foolish even to consider. He had left the ship too soon to breathe that fatal air. He would have to leave shortly if he wanted to spend the night in the comfort of the distant forest. But the beef would be a problem. It was too large to be carried so he fashioned a carrier from some canvas in the lifeboat. By laying the meat on it, he could drag it with less effort than if he carried it. It would be difficult, but not as difficult as leaving it behind and starving. He would need energy if he was to drag the side of beef and still reach the forest by nightfall. He cut a large piece from the beef and prepared to cook it over his fire. He would begin his trip inland afterward.

The first mate of the "Patina" buttoned his coat against the cold as he came on deck. He had been given command shortly after the discovery of the Captain's death. It was very unfortunate. He looked at the agile men climbing up the masts and thought of Manuel and the others and thought of how senselessly they all had died. At first they had thought Manuel's death was an accident. After the others, there was talk of plague. But even these things are worthy of dying for. They had died ridiculously. It seems that the ship's supplier was a poor dealer in livestock. All of the beef he had purchased was diseased. The first mate watched as the last of the poisoned meat was thrown overboard. He turned his heavy collar up and went below to the Captain's quarters. He had not yet put his things in order.

Brent Spencer

and we shall be glad fluent star owl begging at your tombstone tapping in a feathered frenzy kindness chokes my clenching rage coyness masking horror and seduction shielding knowledge in a twisted thimblehead the tempest hoardes its rain for tears and truth were gifts of faith and time now left behind but child, can I dance once more in the graveyard of your mind? can I dance? and night contracts in spinning whispers can I dance? and shadows drape your stonecold eyes midnight drinks to the tinsel in trashcans now your life's love's cut-rate novel where's the prize?

in dawn's clean sting crash your dead-end surrender and come bolting statue streets down whiteshot skies in oldbrown shoes I'm your morning's defender but alone your drumbeat breaks through ancient cries o holy solo drums beyond the wailing! your arrows pierce the penance-pounded hearts you jerk madonnas from their teartrapped altars pronounce orgasmic nunneries obscene you snatch arthritic rosaries from bitter backtracked hands burst clotted hate behind the christian cheek o holy solo drumbeat from the ocean's deep explode the world's clenched hands and little birds will kiss the shore

Cindy Locke

Psalm

Papa your feet are swelling with boredom.
Papa your thighs are dying of spasm.
Papa your hands are tapping in numbness.
Papa your eyes are red from paralysis.
Papa your imagination is silent in the heavy skull of reality.

Oh papa
Papa you're growing old with a good memory and cursed with cavity for a lover.

Oh Papa what price this steep ramp unto DEATH?

Papa, spring is in China town pills of Queens Madona on her hysterical lips

Summer, on borrowed time.

Autumn, surely doomed, busted on the subway slips in his pocket.

Oh Papa
Papa, what of cancer hospital shudder winter in your wheelchair smell of shit and piss.

Michael Scholnick

Tale of a Moon-dark Search

Going down through soggy air I searched in vain to find my hair A bitsy rag-a-muffin shell, admitting that he knew me well, said he'd seen it dancing by alone beside a baby's eye

And so I grazed the bottom place with tumbling calm and charming grace Until I spied my hands at work creating in the sooty murk and as they waved and friendlied, "Hey!" I had to cringe, "To you good day!"

Now as I swirled in towards a tunnel I found my eyes weaving a funnel in which I felt a waving arm evil and trying to do me harm and up I floundered to a break to play chess in the mouth of a snake

Oh long it is since here I've been My hair's still gone and I've grown thin But this I know as sure as not Those baby eyes have shut a knot around my fiery precious tresses upon which all my self confesses.

Nanci Adler

Reading Rimbaud

A beautiful day in Wilkes-Barre!
Perhaps my friends will call for me But I'm feeling evil and don't want to go out and play I should leave signs Watch Out!
for when I'm mad I've got a thin mean smile with a black beret and brooding eyes so all must think I plot oblivion for my senses on the verge of demonic revelation.

Ah yes my friends be met at the door by someone embarrassed from my family or by a kind christian nurse who brings me her big breasts magazines sponge bath and thick hot soup.
And so they be told how it happened suddenly He hardly talks to anyone He sits in his room playing operas and child-like and still sits staring out the window

Oh the torture for no such luck awaits me my fate far worse to wear a jolly hat and chubby smile.
A thousand masks we collect and none of them can talk.

Michael Scholnick

Editor Brent Spencer
Associate Editor Michael Scholnick Art Editor Ella McNamara

Faculty Advisors Dr. Robert Heaman
Dr. Patricia Boyle

Staff Jim Space
Lauren O'Hara
Katy Hauck
Tony Nauroth
Mary Ellen Nauroth
Nanci Adler
Anita Shaw
Carol Geiger
Deborah Ann Hargraves
Pat Hogan
Peaches
Denise Dennis
Janie Weiss

